In reviewing the record, we find that the implied findings of fact and conclusions of law of the trial court are supported by ample evidence and are neither against the great weight and preponderance of the evidence nor manifestly wrong. We will not order a new trial. REVERSED AND RENDERED. AUSTIN and PRESSLER, JJ., concur. NOTES [1] The wife was not named in the wife's suit for divorce, and no answer or counterclaim was filed in the wife's suit. [2] Counsel for the appellants in the divorce proceedings ably explain this distinction, and we adopt their analysis: "In the case of an action for divorce brought by one spouse against another, the suit would be for a dissolution of the marital status. This would continue until one of the parties died, and there would be no issue as to the custody of the children or child support. In other words, the divorce as such would not be terminated by death, but the marital dissolution would. On the other hand, in the case of a proceeding brought by a divorced person to change the custody or visitation rights to a minor child, the child's status and the status of the persons before the court are both determined at the time of the hearing, and the hearing must determine those rights. In such a case, the provisions of Article 4624a are specifically designed to take the place of the provisions of Article 4621 regarding actions for custody after divorce. Since death terminates the divorce, the provisions of Article 4624a remain in effect, and the divorced person's actions for custody will be controlled by those provisions. The change in Article 4624a, as amended by the 1975 Act, allows the f678ea9f9e
